Excerpt: . . . 4 Then after telling in a few sentences what tropisms are, Royce continues: Now it is especially notable that the tropisms of Loeb are not, like the reflex actions of the theories, modes of activity primarily determined by the functions of specific nerve-centres. Furthermore, they are more general and elemental in their character than are any of the acquired habits of an organism. (At this point Royce takes up, for a moment, a matter to one side of my main purpose, namely the problem of self-activity and spontaneity; so I venture to change somewhat the order and emphasis of his argument.) Now it has occurred to me to maintain, in substance, that the factor in mental life which Wundts school defines as Apperception. . . may well be treated, from the purely psychological point of view, as the conscious aspect or accompaniment of...
